Time for Quay plan almost up

Sydney City Council will make a last-chance inspection of Circular Quay on Saturday week in the hope of producing a new plan for the area's development.

The council, which was given a development control plan in 1963 by the Department of Local Government, and asked to make suggestions, has been told it has had its last extension of time to consider the proposal.

The extension ends on July 31. But the council will ask for another extension — to mid-August — to prepare its comments and, possibly, an alternative proposal.
