The council, which is providing much of the impetus for next year's changing face of Sydney, also expects to make some move towards a new parking station at Kings Cross and the redevelopment of the southern side of William Street.

And it will begin a comprehensive review of the Strategic Plan, which has halted uncontrolled city developments.

The plan was introduced in July, 1971.

New buildings that will near completion next year will include the City Council's $9 million complex behind the Town Hall.

The excavations have been under way for some weeks.

But a council spokesman said: "A building will start to appear in the big hole in 1973."

Thirteen other building projects, each worth more than $5 million, are also under way. Some are due for completion in the New Year.

Completion of the link between the western distributor and the Pyrmont Bridge will further relieve traffic congestion in the markets area.
